were a testament to that. The year they had was a bright spot on an otherwise bleak life. She loved Moon but it's hard to bounce back when your soul is torn in two pieces.

They were strong, but there were forces beyond their control; manipulating humans as if they were puppets hanging at the ends of rope.

Without disrupting his mother's life too much, Moon began looking for his father. Reconciliation may have been too lofty a plan, but at the very least he was owed an explanation. He made sure to conduct his clandestine investigations at the library. After a few weeks it was obvious that no one had seen or heard from his father in the past eighteen years. Moon unearthed no arrest records or any internet activity; the crumbs leading to his father's life were nonexistent. Something had happened to his father a few weeks after he left their run-down apartment in the middle of Nowhere, Arizona and Moon was prepared to find out.

His father's birthplace was listed as Sedona, Arizona. Moon drove all night to get there and at eight sharp the courthouse opened. He requested his father's birth certificate and set off for his father's first known address. He pulled up to a decrepit and ancient house that was once white but had been sandblasted down to the bare wood. The midday sun beat down on him as he walked up the long path to the front door. He was starting to feel the futility of his search—it was obvious that this place had been long deserted. He didn't know why but he knocked.

Behind the door a tall man had his hands cupped to the door and quivered. He closed his eyes and he was gone.

The doorknob turned.
